Over 100 lawyers and judges statewide were selected to serve as facilitators for the program. Facilitators were considered as respected individuals who consistently uphold the legal and ethical obligations required by a law career.

Nina S. Tollison, President of The Mississippi Bar stated, “Having participated in the 12th Annual James O. Dukes Professionalism Program, “I have a renewed appreciation of the positive impact and importance of this program for our profession.” The Professionalism Program was named for former Bar President James O. Dukes, who founded the program.

Following keynote addresses by Chief Justice William L. Waller, Jr. at the University of Mississippi Law School and Justice George C. Carlson at Mississippi College School of Law, breakout sessions were conducted in which groups of attorney facilitators and students examined hypothetical legal situations designed to provoke discussion of professionalism and ethical issues that arise in the everyday practice of law.
